Here is a simple question that arises a lot when you are trying to grasp the architecture behind a MVC application. When designing an MVC View, should I instantiate my model behind the view, or instantiate my model inside my view? My understanding of MVC is that the view is the presentation layer, it receives a model and renders the view based on this model. Now, should this model be instantiated inside the view, or should the view instatiate the model and tell the controller the model is ready? A: I would instantiate the model, and just render the view. You can separate the logic of the view from the view itself. If you are retrieving data from the database, and your view needs to filter that data, then it's all abstracted away from your view.
